CEoT 2021 Lunch Symposium March 10th, 2021 – March 10th, 2022

Focus: Chronic Antibody-Mediated Rejection

Program Description and Learning Objectives

Target Audience

The educational design of this activity addresses the needs of healthcare professionals (physicians, surgeons, pharmacists, nurses, and others) and researchers working in the field of transplantation.

Educational Objectives

The following overarching objectives and more specific goals have been identified for this meeting. Having participated in this meeting, attendees will be able to:

Discuss the impact of CAMR on outcomes of kidney transplantation

Describe how CAMR is diagnosed and how new diagnostic tests or biomarkers may help identify CAMR more accurately in the future

Identify emerging therapeutic approaches to CAMR as well as key features of study design and potential new study endpoints

Statement of Need/Program Overview

Increasingly recognized, chronic antibody mediated rejection (CAMR) is a common post-transplant complication that reduces kidney transplant allograft longevity. In this session, thought leaders and researchers in the field will provide attendees with an overview of chronic antibody mediated rejection and its impacts on allograft survival as well as exciting updates on new diagnostics as well as treatment strategies to address it. This session will be held as a lunch symposium during the CEoT 2021 meeting and will involve three discussions from top subject-matter experts within the topic, totaling approximately 25 minutes each. The moderators, at the end of each talk, will then introduce questions that will facilitate additional debate and discussion that will serve to examine each topic in more detail.
